ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION ACT UPDATE (ESEANCLB)

In a recent speech Secretary of Education Duncan called for more money and more resources than teachers and schools currently receive. “... no family should be denied preschool for their children, and (a law that) reflects the real scientific understanding that learning begins at birth, not somehow at age 5.” He noted that not enough children have the preschool education experience that would prepare them for either kindergarten or first grade. Additionally, upon high school graduation many students are not academically prepared to take college classes or to start a career. Most colleges offer remedial courses for these students; however, taking remedial courses means that the students or their parents are paying more money for tuition. Taking remedial courses lengthens the time needed to get a college degree. He expressed the belief that elementary and secondary schools should provide education in the arts, history, foreign languages, and advanced mathematics and science. He also expressed the belief that teachers should have pay commensurate with the importance of the work they are asked to do. He noted that testing should not take up so much time from actual classroom instruction. Unfortunately, much of what the Secretary recommended is not in either the House or the Senate version of the reauthorization of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act.

The Senate version of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act is entitled “Every Child Achieves Act of 2015” (S.1177). Floor debate on this bill in the Senate will begin July 7. No summary of the bill is available at Congress.gov.

AAUW AND “ELECT HER”

The Association of American University Women (AAUW) has the project “Elect Her” in which the organization works to get college women elected to campus positions. This year nine of the women whom AAUW supported won positions on college and university campuses. The organization believes that in order to have women represented in larger numbers at the state and national levels, the effort begins with college age women. Although women comprise more than 50% of the population, currently less than 20% of elected nation-wide positions are held by women.
